Self-Immolation Protets 2011 (BBC and New York Times)

- In March 2011, a 20-year-old monk, Phuntsog, killed himself by self-immolation to protest Chinese policies in Tibet. Security officers locked down the Kirti Monastery and began detaining monks. Some were reportedly beaten or tortured. The following month laypeople gathered at the main gate of the monastery to try to stave off a mass detention of monks, the International Campaign for Tibet reported.

Self-Immolation Protests 2011 (BBC and New York Times)

- The standoff between Chinese forces and Tibetans at Kirti Monastery was the most hostile one since a mass uprising in spring 2008 across the Tibetan plateau that involved rioting and protests by Tibetans and a brutal crackdown by mostly ethnic Han security officers.

Self-Immolation Protests 2011 (BBC and New York Times)

- In August 2011, another monk set himself alight on a bridge in the center of Daofu, a town in Ganzi County in Sichuan province.
The act of protest appeared to reflect resistance to increased Chinese repression of loyalty to the Dalai Lama.
